

RE- IMAGINE

COMMUNITY

The community understood as a compound of individuals who share common elements and interests, facilitating mutual recognition, is a notion that the spread of SARS-CoV-2 has put under revision.

The pandemic fostered a feeling of global community that led to border closures, social distancing, and confinement, all in the interest of mutual care. The way in which we have experimented with the community is changing, and the questions about our future are leading the way...

Can we set up new forms of community? What are the implications of the mitigation of corporal contact? Are we heading toward a remotely assisted community model? Are common interest and equality, inherent to the idea of community, sustainable aspirations in this context? Will there be new ways of discrimination and exclusion?

Many of these questions are echoed in the works that shape this module. Although reflections are made within other contexts, they can help us to visualize our potential in the configuration of more solidary, respectful, and fair communities.
